Avoidable contracts in the context of liquidation proceedings

Now that the economic downturn is slowly over, still many companies are getting in a situation of insolvency from day to day. When it becomes impossible to rescue the given company, everyone is about the protection of his own interest: some creditors try to conclude separate agreements with the debtor to ensure satisfaction of their claims or they demand advance provision of the services under an already existing contract, whereas the debtor – sometimes via a creditor company influenced by the debtor – tries to remove and conceal its assets. The provisions about the protection of the creditors' interests may provide effective measures to prevent the debtor from misusing the asymmetric information in its possession in order to discriminate against the majority of its creditors.
